THE INFLUENCE OF RESIDENTIAL PROPERTY PRICES ON INDONESIA ECONOMIC GROWTH

Erni Pujiningsih, Rifki Khoirudin, Uswatun Khasanah

Abstract

Economic growth is an important measure for measuring the progress of economic development. By increasing production capacity to produce more output. This is because the economy develops or changes over time, and the changes or developments themselves put pressure on the economy. However, during the Covid-19 pandemic, conditions in various sectors slowed down, one of which was the property sector. The decline in residential property sales and the decline in demand for property resulted in a slowdown during the pandemic, namely that

Abstract

The comprehension of the textbook and augmented Solow growth model has been studied to picture the consequences of workforce growth and capital. In the age of digitalization, Information and Communications Technology (ICT) is also the first necessity identified factors affecting labor productivity. This paper revisits the augmented Solow growth equation by integrating ICT as an explainer that improves labor productivity in Southeast Asian emerging economies. We used a Two-Way Random-Effects Model to
